The talks of China Elevator, known as deconfliction, began in 2015 after the Russian military deployed forces to Khmeimim Air Base, a military installation along Syria's Mediterranean coastline that has been used to launch airstrikes against opposition forces in Syria in support of President Bashar al-Assad's regime. Russia's arrival in Syria complicated U.S.-led operations against the Islamic State military group in Syria, which began a year earlier.

An agreement signed between Washington and Moscow in fall 2015 called for the use of specific communication frequencies and the establishment of a phone hotline in which a U.S. colonel in Qatar and a Russian counterpart in Syria "deconflict" operations regularly but do not share intelligence. When there are points of contention between the two militaries, though, the existing arrangement has not left many options for U.S. officers, said Lt. Gen. Jeffrey Harrigian, the top Air Force commander in the Middle East.

"Our perspective has been that there needs to be another layer that allows us to have a more senior-level discussion, and we've got to work through where that layer is," Harrigian told reporters in Baghdad this week, suggesting that adding a U.S. general with somewhere between one and three stars and a Russian counterpart would be helpful.

Harrigian said that U.S. aircraft "on occasion get out of the way" of Russian jets. This was especially true a few months ago when both countries were launching airstrikes regularly near the Syrian city of Palmyra, he said. Such decisions could be hampering the overall operation, however.

"In essence, we had some conflicting operational desires that ultimately we ended up working Elevator Manufacturer way through over time because we were never able to elevate this discussion," Harrigian said. "Did we miss targets? I can't say that for sure, but I would tell you that optimally we would have gone after that in a different manner."
